'Drones' Will Fly In Atom-Bomb Test

Naval Men Learn to Direct Pilotless Planes.

SAN DIEGO. — Naval aviators are learning to direct pilotless planes which will fly through columns of radioactive smoke and gases in the Bikini atom bomb tests.

Pilotless G-planes fighters equipped with radio remote control will soar through the gaseous pillars rising above the atomic bombs to determine the effect on planes flying through radioactive matter.

The pilotless "drones" will be controlled by "mother planes" equipped with radio control. Pilots in training here are learning the complex technique of controlling the pilotless planes in flight.

The "drones" will be launched from the 27,000-ton aircraft carrier Shangri-La, Rear Adm. C. A. F. Sprague, who commands the special naval groups participating in the tests, said it would be the first time the navy ever has attempted to launch pilotless fighters from a carrier.

After the pilots of the control planes perfect the takeoff, he said, the Shangri-La will launch the trial runs off the southern California coast.

The "drones" will be controlled in taking off by the mother planes working in conjunction with radio operators aboard the carrier.

Sprague said that, for the first time in naval operations, helicopter pilots would play an important role. They will be used both as observation planes and as camera and courier aircraft. They will hover over the bomb blasts and will fly the negative back to the flagship for development.

The photographic planes will make a complete mosaic picture of the Bikini target area immediately before the bombing and as soon afterward as possible, Sprague said.

This will enable naval experts to determine the effect on target ships and the general surface of the ocean as well, he said.
